

If you have chosen to fund your account through a credit card, you should be aware that you will have to make payments to your credit card company regardless of whether your trading is profitable. Depending upon your credit card terms and your payment practices, there is potential that you may become liable to your credit card company for substantial interest charges and other fees.

We encourage you to consider funding by credit card only in instances where it is convenient for you. You should not fund by credit card if that is your only source of liquid funds. You should understand that trading futures, options and/or foreign exchange carries a substantial risk of loss. Given the leverage involved, these losses can be quite large and occur quite rapidly, potentially exceeding the funds you have deposited in your account or have earmarked as risk capital. You should disregard any suggestions from any source whatsoever that the foregoing risks can be limited, minimized or eliminated.

When funding a regulated futures account by credit card, the transaction will be processed through an IG Markets affiliate located in the United Kingdom. These funds will not be held in a customer segregated account subject to regulation under the Commodity Futures Trading Commission ("CFTC") segregation rules until actually received by IG Markets. While your account at IG Markets will ordinarily promptly reflect a credit following funding by credit cards, you should be aware that there will be a period until IG Markets actually receives funds for your account. In extreme market conditions, this delay in receiving actual funds could make it more likely that positions could be liquidated. Furthermore, in the event of an issue whereby IG Markets never actually receives funds on your behalf, your account will be appropriately adjusted.
